Operations Report:

Mills Gallery is a contemporary art gallery in Orlando with a team of four to five people. Its public offerings include exhibitions, artwork sales, private events, art consulting, and artist mentorship. These activities require a lot of coordination, scheduling, and information sharing, which are important areas to consider in our operations analysis.

Our research identifies potential opportunities to simplify exhibition preparation, event bookings, artwork tracking, and customer follow-up. We still need to confirm the internal problems such as delayed approvals or inconsistent records, which are things we can ask about during the interview. We still need specific statements and observations from the partner visit to support those findings and to take us to the next stage of our project.

The next step is to walk through one recent exhibition and one completed event booking with the gallery team. We should identify who handles each task, where information is stored, and where delays or repeated work occur. Based on that evidence, we can recommend improvements, such as clear task ownership or a simple inquiry tracker. Our recommendations should address problems the gallery confirms and help its small team spend more time supporting the artists and community.
